discovered a sunken, circular cemetery that stretches for more than 10 acres. Over the centuries, some 8,000 bodies — including those of adult women and children as young as 5 — were buried there, along with more than 300 cremated human bones and artifacts from the late Roman Empire, archaeologists from the University of Rome Sapienza say. Their discovery raises questions about the purpose of the cemetery — which the researchers say was not a mass burial for the poor or the sick, but rather a final resting place for people who might have had ties to the circus community. They also say it suggests that the Romans were aware that we now call a group of animals to the circus, known as the “ring,” meant the same thing it did when used for the Romans.
