Downloadâ€œ. Over the last week there has been lots of discussion of how to resolve the recently discovered vulnerability, CRIME. Fortunately, while the attack was extremely serious, it was also entirely theoretical. It was trivial to create a decoy document which would trigger the application to disclose a large amount of sensitive information. How many people in your organization use encryption and how much sensitive information do they hold? We all knew that organizations hold personal information for a wide variety of purposes and it is difficult to predict precisely what they are doing with that data. We also knew that as the number of people using the service rises the probability that data could be leaked or stolen also rises. Even the small number of Tor users who have been attacked in the past must have been shocked and angry that their data was compromised. Given the past tense and the fact that CRIME was a theoretical attack it was reasonable to assume that the data leak would have been plugged quickly. Fortunately, the Tor community has taken a responsible approach to the incident. Unfortunately, attacks can only be prevented with an effective response. In the case of CRIME the attackers used social engineering techniques to trick operators into disclosing their data.

Unfortunately, Tor reveals a lot about the operators even if they do not give out their real name and email address. While the operators claim that they were not deterred by the threat of legal action, most end users would probably be put off by the risk. This means that the operator's security could be threatened and if their system is compromised, the attacker could retrieve information about many other users. Given how much data is held by online services, this risk is not trivial. In fact, it is one of the biggest risks to end users - more than the risk of identity theft or a credit card being stolen in a physical store. The good news is that there are ways to limit the threat of attacks of this type and the Tor Project has been at the forefront of devising protections. I will be speaking about several of the developments in this area at the BlackHat USA conference on August 29-30 in Las Vegas. One of the most important techniques, developed by the Tor Project, is a “fingerprinting” technique which preserves the privacy of end users. Fingerprinting is a relatively new
