Development and validation of a real-time PCR for the detection of the ice nucleation activity of Pseudomonas syringae pv. glycinea. Pseudomonas syringae pv. glycinea is the causal agent of green peach aphid (GPA) green pitting. This bacterium produces the ice nucleation active factor (INF), a heat-stable proteinaceous compound that is important for biofilm formation, and which is essential for GPA-GPA interaction. In this study, a real-time PCR was developed and validated to detect the presence of the INF gene in P. syringae pv. glycinea. The assay was tested using a collection of 69 isolates from several geographic origins and host species. A melting curve was acquired at the end of the PCR-program, and a single melting temperature (T_m) of $87.5 \pm 0.2^\circ\text{C}$ was determined. The probe was designed to be complementary to the 3' region of the INF gene to avoid interference with other genes located in the same region. The specificity of the PCR assay was confirmed by melt curve analysis. The detection limit was 100 copies/ml, and the sensitivity was tested with different concentrations of the target plasmid, confirming a logarithmic relationship between the concentration of the target and the threshold cycle. Over 200 companies and organizations from around the world are calling on the Federal Communications Commission to avoid taking any action at this week c6a93da74d
